

Piano

by Dan Howell

Her wattled fingers can't stroke the keys with much grace or assurance anymore, and the tempo is always rubato, halting, but still that sound—notes quivering and clear in their singularity, filing down the hallway—aches with pure intention, the melody somehow prettier as a remnant than whatever it used to be.